Can a girl from the wrong side of the tracks and a guy who drives a Lexus find common ground? Joya Hernandez and Drew Benedict met and fell in love before they had time to realize how different they are: she's the daughter of a single mother, raised to follow the Bible and not the latest trends. He's the son of a fitness center franchise owner who's always gone after what he wants. Now he wants Joya, but she's an old-fashioned girl. Her determination to follow the beliefs she was raised in clashes with Drew's desire and when they become engaged, the tension increases. What if those differences that separate them are greater than the things that they share? If the engagement encounters so much trouble, what will the marriage be like?
