William Wilson

The right of free discussion, as it is inalienable to man, is happily secured by Constitutional Law to every citizen of the United States. Of course, the use which is made of it ought to be at once decorous, and for the promotion of the private and the public welfare. With this object in view, and under a sense of this obligation, it is exercised upon the present occasion. The Author of the brief and hasty hints contained in the following pages, upon a subject which might well command and occupy several volumes, conceives that he owes it to himself to state, that he does not view the Great Question which is now pending before the independent freemen of our country, nor write in relation to it, as a partizan. He has ever believed, and acted in correspondence therewith, that it ought to be held in abeyance to principle: and this conviction does not diminish, but increase, by the progress of time, and by the acquisition of experience. His intimate and cherished friends have always been found, indifferently, in both of the two great parties of Democrats and Whigs, which have formerly divided our citizens; and even now, when these parties are rapidly undergoing the process of decomposition and dissolution, he numbers among their remains, notwithstanding they are still clinging to, and battling for, Doulocracy, individuals, not a few, who are objects of his esteem and regard, as well as in the swelling ranks of the redeemed, and renovated, and living Democracy of our age. Principles, and not men; and men as the representatives, and in order to the success, of principles, have been, and still are, his governing maxims. So, he thinks, it ought to be with all. This the present crisis emphatically demands. He also feels himself uninfluenced by any geographical prejudices, as far as he can know himself and his motives. He loves the union of these States, both as a
